As a firm, McGlinchey always strives to give clients more. More than they expect, more than they anticipate, more than anyone else. In a time of unprecedented upheaval like this, that means providing both timely, actionable information, and helping clients think through not just the issues of today, but of tomorrow, and beyond. We will navigate this challenge together.

While the course of the COVID-19 crisis continues to evolve, the longer-term strategic impacts of the situation also require analysis and strategic planning. Businesses need to not only plan for the immediate effect on their employees but also on the longer-term implication on their business plans.

Employment Law

Employers must be ready to address the delicate balancing act that must be performed between ensuring that workers have a safe (disease-free) workplace and protecting employee rights, particularly confidentiality.

Financial Services

COVID-19 has created unique regulatory considerations for the financial services industry, such as the tension between legal requirements that financial services companies conduct regulated activity only from certain authorized locations and the recommendation of having employees work from home to limit the spread of the Coronavirus. State regulatory agencies have begun to disseminate guidance granting relief from these restrictions so that personnel may work from home when necessary.

Real Estate

As fears of the Coronavirus spread, it is likely that all commercial real estate may see a decline. Retail businesses may find that their regular flow of customers is substantially reduced. Service businesses may find that their hours are curtailed because employees are quarantined or because customers do not want to come to a place where they have to physically interact with employees, such as barbershops, restaurants, and beauty parlors.

Commercial property values may decline, rent rates may decrease, and the ability of tenants to make their lease payments may increase loan default rates.

Business Disruption

Because the virus originated in China, and because of China's role in the operation of the global supply chain, the disruption of manufacturing in China ripples into the buyers around the world. Additionally, mandatory business closure orders in the United States to combat the spread of the virus are causing demand issues that additionally result in supply, operational, and loss of revenue issues. Ultimately, the closures by order could result in stifling domestic demand which may force business closures. Whether it is an interruption in the supply chain, unavailability for production, financial, or another inability to meet contractual obligations, many contractual and legal issues will arise due to the manufacturing and mandated economic disruptions. “Force Majeure” provisions exist in most commercial business contracts including supply, sales, and distribution agreements and commercial leases, in which the provisions are used to allocate risk of loss with respect to events the parties could not have foreseen or controlled. As a contractual provision between the parties, such provisions are most often upheld by courts absent specific exceptions. The governing law and venue provisions of such contracts may also come into play. Certain business interruptions may implicate insurance. Business interruptions upstream or downstream, contractual review, and moving quickly are legal issues and business concerns that come together at the forefront of this current crisis.
